Labor Day has come and gone, the days are getting shorter; the kids are back in school. Something else has also past. Were you one of the many people that let Sunday September 9, Grandparent’s Day, come and go with hardly any notice? If so, you are probably not alone.

Marian McQuade of Fayette County, West Virginia, is credit with the idea of linking children to the wisdom and heritage of their grandparents. President Jimmy Carter, proclaimed a National Grandparent’s Day in 1978. The day is celebrated every year on the first Sunday after Labor Day.

Now, recent research shows that grandparents, as well as grandchildren, may benefit by sharing time together. According to a study at the University of Haifa in Israel, grandchildren who were taken care of by their grandparents during their childhood expressed a far greater desire to take care of their grandparents as they aged. Even little things like occasional babysitting for a few hours were enough to make grandchildren want to return the favor to their grandparents. One can imagine how much stronger that bond grows as you look at recent Census figures that report 28% of preschoolers are regularly cared for by their grandparents during the hours their parents work.

The University of Haifa study also revealed that not only did grandchildren who were taken care of by their grandparents express a desire to help, but that they actually were very involved in day-to-day care giving tasks, such as transportation, shopping, nursing care and emotional support.

The practical meaning of the research is that, both out of love and necessity, grown grandchildren can, and often are, involved in helping their grandparents and they, too, can be included in your elder life planning. As author Lois Wyse has said, “Grandchildren are the dots that connect the lines from generation to generation.”

Judith S. Parnes, L.C.S.W., C.M.C., Gerontologist and Elder Care Consultant is Executive Director of Elder Life Management, Inc., Ocean, NJ. ELM provides quality elder care planning, management and Medicaid application services to older adults and their families. Please visit www.elderlifemanagement.org or call (732) 493-8080 for more information.